Orfeo ed Euridice

An Opera by

Christoph Willibald Gluck

Text by Ranieri de Calzabigi

First performed in Vienna in 1762

CAST

Orfeo	Andrea Mellis
Amor	Frances Dietz
Euridice	Beverley Cohen

Euridice has died and Orpheus her husband is stricken with grief. His love for her is so strong that the Gods give him permission to go to Hades and lead her back to life. They make one condition—that on the journey back he shall not look at her. Euridice though imagines that this refusal to look at her is an indication that he does not love her. She refuses to follow. At last Orpheus breaks his promise to the Gods and looks back. In an instant Euridice understands the love which he has been unable to show, but the Gods' command has been broken and she must return to Hades. However the Gods once again relent and waive the condition they had previously imposed. Orpheus and Euridice are finally reunited in life.

This is an abbreviated version. As originally written, the opera was in three acts and contained much choral and dance music.

There will be an interval of 15 minutes.

The setting is a street between the houses of Gorgibus and Sganarelle. Célie is in love with Lélie to whom she has been engaged with the consent of her father Gorgibus. However the latter now wants to marry her to the wealthy Valère. She runs rebelliously into the street and faints, dropping a locket containing a picture of Lélie. Sganarelle who happens to be passing helps to carry Célie back into her house. His wife sees this and imagines they are having an affair. She picks up the locket and is looking at it closely when Sganarelle returns. He imagines she is having an affair with Lélie. By somewhat similar misunderstandings Célie becomes convinced Lélie is having an affair with Madame Sganarelle and Lélie is led to believe Célie is married to Sganarelle. The maid comes to the rescue and clears all the misunderstandings. Valère's marriage to someone else becomes known and Célie and Lélie are reunited with her father's blessing.
